SCOTLAND

ISLAY

Islay is the southernmost region of the Scottish island chain, where the most characteristic Scottish single malt whiskies are produced. This special character is due to the peat. Over the centuries, the peat has mixed with salty seawater containing iodine and seaweed residue. This gives the whiskies a medicinal character and a salty smell and flavour! Powerful, dry and smoky - these are the hallmarks of Islay whiskies. There are no fewer than eight distilleries on this island.

SPEYSIDE

Speyside is a relatively small region from which the leading single malts in the whole of Scotland originate. Speyside single malts are sweeter in flavour with hints of sultanas and other ripe fruits. This sweetness comes from the wooden casks matured in sherry. These whiskies often contain a hint of nuts and malt. Depending on the barley and the drying in peat, there are also smoky notes. Due to the lack of peat, most whiskies are only characterised by a hint of peat. Speyside malts can be lighter and strongly floral or robust, rich malt with a hint of sherry.

HIGHLANDS

The Highlands have everything to offer! A smooth whisky or a robust whisky with a sophisticated sea breeze? The Highlands are simply too big to categorise the whiskies. However, if you want to think broadly, you can describe the whiskies as robust single malts with deeper notes of peat and smoke. Geography influences the style and flavour of Highland whisky. A typical whisky from the north can be recognised by its malty-sweet flavours and strong floral, heathery aromas. Whiskies from the south, also known as Midland, are generally softer and lighter with a pronounced dryness and fruity flavours. In the east, which stretches along the North Sea coast, the whiskies are full-bodied and dry, with lots of fruit and a certain spiciness. In the west, full-bodied, distinctive single malts are produced with a refined, light peat and smoke flavour. This region also produces the typical Maritime Highland whisky, which is distilled close to the coast. The closer you get, the more sea you taste. This ranges from seaweed, brine and shellfish to beach fires, sea breezes and iodised seaweed.

LOWLANDS

The Lowlands are also known as Scotland's backyard. The area consists mainly of fields that are ideal for growing grain that can be used to make whisky. Whiskies from the Lowlands are somewhat lighter in colour and taste than the solid whiskies from the Highlands. They typically have gentle flavours of grass, grain and flowers and a dry finish.

IRELAND

Irish whiskey is known for its aromatic and full-bodied whiskeys that have no smoky flavour. They are rich and full-bodied. The biggest difference to Scotland is that the Irish also use unmalted barley for the pot still. The government levied taxes on malt, but not on the barley grain. As a result, the unmalted barley had to be distilled three times instead of twice, as it is more difficult to convert the sugar into alcohol than with malted barley.
